The effects of microfracture on wave propagation were observed by a series of scanning electron microscope (SEM) tests and wave-velocity measurements. A spectrum analysis was introduced to analyze the attenuation coefficient and the wave number of seismic waves propagating through microfractured rock mass.

In the present work, stationary discontinuities and fluttery instabilities of wave propagation in saturated poro-elastoplastic media are analysed in the frame of Biot theory. The generalized Biot formulations are particularly employed for simulating non-linear coupled hydro-mechanical behaviour of the media.
